i-dont.com.au Online Social Dating

Website research shows that after separation and divorce there is a need and a desire for people to create new social lives and when the time is right to begin that all important new relationship. Last month when asked the online poll question, "Would you participate in an online divorcee / divorcee dating service?" 76% of i-dont.com.au visitors who participated were in favour of the new service. Research from i-dont.com.au Discussion Forums and the New Relationships Article sections have also indicated popularity in topics surrounding recovery, re-establishing past relationships and friendships and working on improving yourself for the next significant relationship in your life.

"There is a wonderful life after divorce and creating a new social life can be a liberating experience when it is with people who really understand where you are coming from" says site spokesperson Melinda Poole. For many who have been divorced, socialising and dating people of like experience can be a lot more relaxing. Ms Poole says "It's not just about dating, it is primarily about meeting new friends and building your own social network that is separate to your ex partner" she says.

For most separated and divorced Australians it needs to be a soft transition; starting with new introductions, building new friendships and a new sense of confidence. It's here that people approach the idea of dating and new partnerships," says Ms Poole. "i-dont.com.au can help make the introductions and put you in touch with services that can help you build self confidence," she says.

i-dont.com.au Social Dating is the latest in a string of online resources available to Australian's who are experiencing separation and divorce.
